A panda's diet is made up of about 99% bamboo. They will peel off the hard outer layer and eat the soft inside of the plant. They will also eat the leaves. Occasionally, they will eat a small animal or plant. Pandas eat very fast and spend as much as 12 hours a day eating.

To help pandas eat lots of bamboo, they have very wide, flat teeth. This helps them to crush the hard bamboo in their mouth. Pandas also have enlarged wrist bones that they use like thumbs to grip the bamboo.

When panda cubs are born, they are very small. In fact, they are usually only a little bigger than the size of a crayon box when they are born. They are also born hairless and don't open their eyes for six weeks. The mother panda bear will hold the cub in its paw and cradle it close to its heart.

Unlike most bears, pandas do not hibernate. When it is winter, they will head down the mountain where it is warmer. Pandas usually live alone and typically don't like to interact with others. Like many other bears, pandas can climb trees.

It is estimated that only about 1,000 panda bears are left in the wild. They are at risk because the forests they live in are being cut down and destroyed. It is said that pandas are the most endangered species in the world.
